Market Overview

LOS ANGELES APARTMENT MARKET

Los Angeles Metro Overview

The Los Angeles metropolitan apartment market remains one of the largest and most supply-constrained rental markets in the country. High homeownership costs, limited developable land, and a large renter population continue to support demand for well-located rental housing, even as rent growth has moderated from the highs of recent years.

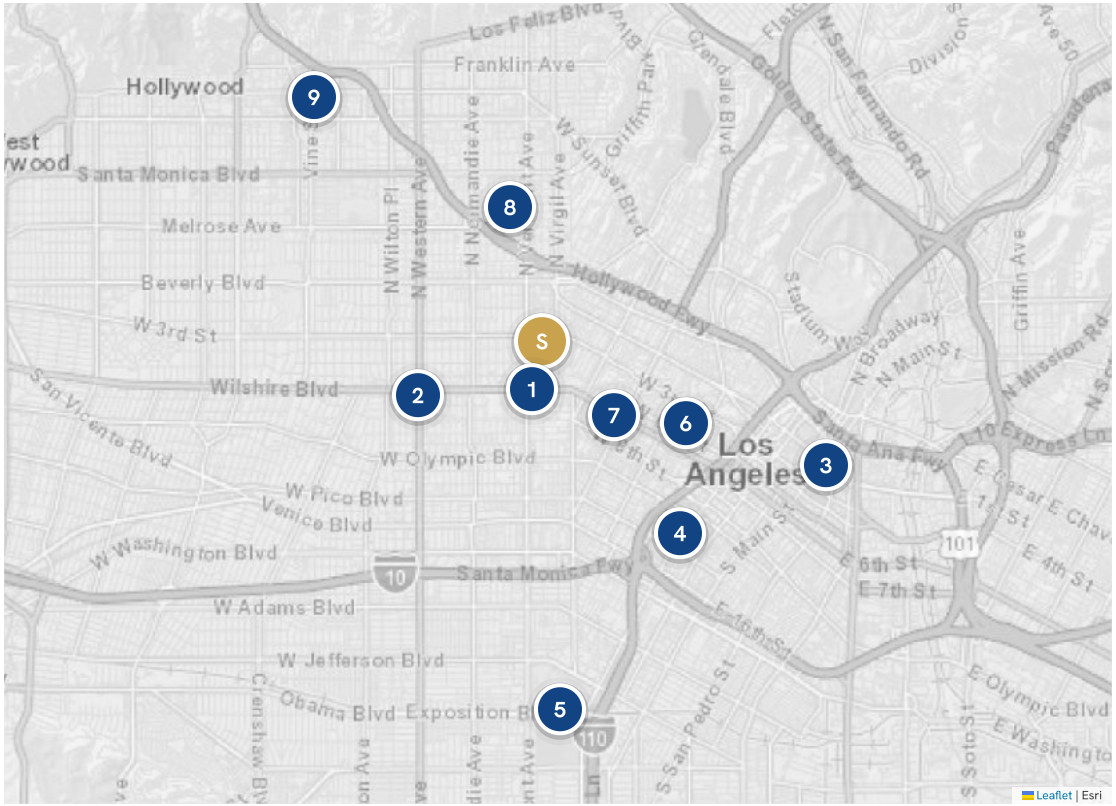

Post-1978 construction sits outside the Los Angeles Rent Stabilization Ordinance, and product of this kind trades at a premium to the rent-controlled stock that makes up most of the county's small multifamily inventory.

Koreatown Submarket

Koreatown is among the densest rental submarkets in the county, anchored by the Wilshire Boulevard office corridor, a deep retail and dining district, and the Metro D Line. The area draws renters working across Downtown Los Angeles, the Wilshire corridor, and the USC and Exposition Park medical and university employment base.

Sales activity in the surrounding zip codes reflects a consistent bid for stabilized 1980s-vintage product, with the comparable set on the following pages trading between $230,000 and $355,000 per unit at cap rates of 4.01% to 6.90%.
